Mission

The Constitution-class is Starfleet's first true explorer. In the prime universe timeline, explorers would not be seen until early in the 24th century.

Technological insights gleaned from scans of the Narada have advanced Federation technology faster than in the prime timeline.

Background

The destruction of the Kelvin was the divergence point between the prime universe timeline and the alternate timeline that was created with that ship's destruction. In the original timeline, the Constitution-class would be launched in 2245, but in the alternate timeline those plans were shelved while the Federation reverse-engineered the technology scanned from the Narada. Launching in 2257, Starfleet debuted its first explorer, a massive starship dwarfing all previous Federation designs in both size and power.

Features

The Constitution is armed with powerful rapid-fire type VIII phaser banks, Mk 22 DF photon torpedo launchers, and the very sturdy CIDSS-2 deflector shield grid. This armament makes the alternate universe Constitution significantly more powerful than its prime universe counterpart. As with the prime Constitution, the alternate Constitution has a reinforced hull and life support.

Alternate Timeline Availability

The arrival of the Narada from 154 years in the future had a profound effect on not just Federation history, but the history of the entire Alpha Quadrant. The Kelvin's survivors escaped the Narada with detailed scans of the ship from the future, enough for the brightest minds of Starfleet to reverse engineer some of the technology they witnessed, putting the Federation decades ahead of where it should have been in its systems, particularly with weapons and shields.
